

Mrs. Lancelot a Comedy of Assumptions of Assumptions (Classic Reprint)

Pared down to the bones, so to speak, here is what happened. The Marquis was talking to three or four young men at Arthur's, where he was dining. The talk had drifted from a battle in Bermondsey to politics, and from politics to ways and means. Reform, said the Marquis, could be staved off, because an election could be staved off. The King was very ill, much worse than he chose to discover; but this was known, and a demise of the Crown was no time for an appeal to the country. If the Whigs could be beat, he (the Marquis) would take office and hold it, with a decent backing. But where was he to get that, he wanted to know. Then it was that Lord Netherbow spoke up for the Treasury. There were a number of men there biting their nails, who could bite to better purpose. The Marquis's very blue eyes concentrated. Name me three he said, plying his toothpick. The names came out with one consent from the three or four young mouths.
